

In the 1950s and 1960s, the numbers were especially high, reflecting the post-World War II baby boom. Germany's numbers peak in the 1960s with over 12.6 million newborns.

France also exhibits a similar trend, with a peak in the 1960s, followed by a stabilization.

Poland had significant newborn numbers in the early decades, but these numbers gradually decreased over time.

For smaller countries like Luxembourg, the trends are less pronounced, but the general pattern of a peak in the mid-20th century followed by a decline can still be observed.

The 21st century data suggests a general decline in the number of newborns across most countries, likely reflecting modern societal shifts, including lower birth rates and changing demographics.
